Columns and Views provide multiple properties that allow you to define templates and change the visual presentation of their elements (cells, rows, summary items, etc.). A template is applied to multiple elements in the same scope. If however, you have more than one template that can be applied to a target element (e.g. a cell, row), you can implement custom logic to choose the required template. This allows you to provide a different visual appearance for individual grid elements. For example, a template that defines the presentation of data rows is specified by the `TableView.DataRowTemplateSelector` property. If you want to conditionally apply templates to them, create a `template selector` - a class that chooses a template if the required condition is met. This class must derive from the `DataTemplateSelector` class and override the `SelectTemplate` method, to return a template which meets the required condition. Assign its instance to the `TableView.DataRowTemplateSelector` property. Example 1: Applying Templates Based on Custom Logic This example demonstrates how to use `DataRowTemplateSelector` to apply different templates to even and odd data rows. Use the `How to dynamically select a row details template with DataRowTemplateSelector` example if you want to dynamically select Row Details Templates.
